W. F. ARBANT, writing from Linkville to the Roseburg (Oregon) Pantagraph

In the battle on Lost river the citizens claimed to have killed several Indians, but the fact is they killed three or four but the fact is they killed three or four little children—among them one little babe tied to a board and set up against a sagebrash. Some of the men reported that they shot at a big Injun with a white shirt on—this was the big Injun. Instead of the Indians being camped near the Lost river, they were at the cave, on the west side of the lake, where they have been ever since about the first they have been ever since about the first of the trouble. I saw in another paper where the editor speaks very lightly of the war. It may seem to people at a distance of two or three hundred miles like a triffing affair, and that it will soon be over, but it looks very different to the people here; we have no assurance of its being over this winter. It does not look like ending very soon, when the Indians can kill seventeen men without losing one of their party, which is no doubt a

It is notable that through all the discreditable revelations being made at Washington the names of men like Sumper and Schurz and Trumbull are never once mentioned, and nobody has once thought that they would possibly be implicated. They belong to the old-fashloand type of Senators, who sought position for honor and usefulness, not for pelf, and whose hands were always clean. But of late years the golden calf has been set up in the Capitol, and the people's representatives are too often found groveling at its feet, instead of looking up to the noble image that crowns the dome, the severe emblem of country and
